CHAPTER 5

Question: If our school is shaped like an octagon, and it has 8 sides, how many different ways can I get lost in the halls?

Answer: So far, hundreds. And counting.

By the second week of the school year, we're already starting to have quizzes and tests in all my classes. My first one is a vocabulary test in Spanish, and I get a 96 percent. I missed one word—or rather, I misspelled hombre, writing hombe. I knew it had an r. I was just so nervous that I was careless. Oh well; 96 is still good. My mom is always telling me that there's no prize for perfect, but when tests are graded out of 100, isn't the goal to get 100?

Getting the best grades was always a way I could help my parents out while Theo was sick. If I was doing well in school, that was one less thing they had to worry about. They never asked me to get straight As, but I felt like it was the least I could do.

I'm much less nervous for math class. We have a quiz on our algebra unit. I'm very comfortable with equations because we did some of this exact work in my math class last year, in my old school. I was so good at it that Molly actually asked me to tutor her a few times, so I know I've got this.

We have all period to take the quiz. Mr. Jackson passes out the worksheets at the beginning of the class, and we all start working. I easily finish in about twenty-five minutes, feeling confident as I check all my work.

But when I turn the paper over, I see the extra credit question. Describe an example of something that is infinite or something that illustrates the concept of infinity. Be creative!

I panic. At his desk at the front, Mr. Jackson is grading papers from his last class's quiz. To my right, a few rows up, I can see Joshua writing furiously. All around me, kids are filling out their worksheets. Am I the only one who doesn't understand infinity?

I'm practically sweating through my T-shirt and

LAURA DAIL LITERARY AGENCY

Listen. I don't have a lot of time. So I'll catch you up quick. Humanity's missing. My dad invented a light speed engine on our schoolship, which drew some . . . unwanted attention, alienwise. Now we're the only ones left: a middle school from Ganymede, stuck on Earth, no idea where to go next. And—oh yeah—we're in the middle of maybe the most important battle this planet has ever seen.

"I know you're in here, Jack!" my enemy says, chomping down on her gum and popping a bubble. "It's over. Time for the great Jacksonville Graham to surrender."

I'm stuck inside one of New York's empty skyscrapers, crouching behind a giant column, listening to footsteps slowly click clack across the room. Every sound boom-echoes through this lobby. Between its gold-plated walls. Up to its high ceilings carved with images of the city.

"Come out, come out, wherever you are," she calls.

I tilt my body farther back into the corner, trying to minimize my shadow. Hiding is harder than you'd think, given the bulky contraption on my back. It grazes the column with an unfortunate clank.

"You know you can't escape."

She's right. I'll never make it past her to the exit. Every approach to the doors puts me in her line of fire. But there has to be a way out. There's always a way out.

I peek around the column to survey my options: A gift shop, maybe twenty feet away. Public restrooms on either end of the main atrium. A set of escalators, still running smoothly even after the world has ended. And a bank of five elevators on the opposite wall, each with a different destination carved into an adjacent silver plate:

FLOORS 4 THROUGH 49.

FLOORS 50 THROUGH 99.

FLOORS 100 THROUGH 149.

FLOORS 150 THROUGH 199.

OUTDOOR OBSERVATION DECK: 175th FLOOR.

There's also a space elevator that leaves from the mezzanine, just behind the escalators: "With stops at 100,000km, 200,000km, and the Lagrange Point 1 Resort and Spa." But that's probably overkill. All I need is to get to that observation deck. Then I'll be able to—

Zavamb. The sound of her laser rifle powering up.

CHAPTER 4 GEORGE

I board the bus behind a gray-haired man with pointy elbows who stoops down and shakes his rear in front of me as he drops his change into the slot. He counts the coins out loud as they plunk against the bottom: "One. Two. Three. Four. Five," then picks up his two large shopping bags and grumbles something before hobbling down the aisle.

As the old man collapses into the nearest open seat, the bus driver glances in my direction. She has curly red hair and brown eyes that look right through me. Remembering that I don't have any money for the fare, I freeze. "Ummm," I begin. Invisible or not, I still feel bad stealing a free ride. An idea hits me. Straightening a pretend tie, I state, "I'm part walrus," extra loud just in case I'm not invisible to the bus security camera. There's got to be a discount for animals going to the zoo, right? Otherwise, how could they afford to get there?

The bus driver closes the door behind me. I stumble down the aisle, struggling to stay standing as the bus pulls forward. I'm on my way.

I slide into an empty seat. A kid covered in freckles sits across the aisle. His slightly-less-freckled mother reads the paper on one side, and on the other, wedged against the window, a gopher-ish creature whispers into his ear. This creature is about my height, wearing an oversized yellow hat, and her face is covered in fur. I try not to stare, but after two or three stops, I realize I am doing nothing but staring, and I think she's staring at me, too. She can see me!

She's not like anyone I've ever seen before, and if I'm not like anyone anyone's ever seen before, are she and I a we?

Nervously, I nod to her.

The gopher woman nods back, then glances to the empty seat beside me. One of her eyebrows goes up and the other goes down.

I study the empty seat, too. My fingers run along the bumpy black plastic. I guess we're not exactly the same. She has a friend.

Beyond the curtain. The last room on the left. As I said, she's very sick."

Along the yellow-painted, cinder-block hall stood a couple of big, steel machines on wheels with lots of wires, buttons, and dials that gave me the shivers. There was a silver trolley with dozens of shelves holding trays where that smell of broccoli came from. A doctor in a white coat, his shoes squeaking, passed me in the opposite direction. In the rooms on either side, I saw people in chairs or sitting on beds that propped up their backs, with their food on a special table that reached over their laps. In other rooms, I saw people my parents' age helping older people eat. In other rooms, as I kept on walking, I saw people lying down, sleeping or just looking at the ceiling, with silver bed rails on both sides of them, like they weren't allowed to get out.

I came near the end of the hall. A heavy curtain hung across it in green folds which I pushed aside and went around. Behind it, what was left of the hall seemed darker and emptier. No machines. No trolleys. No TVs. A special, quiet place. I'd expected to find a nurse here, but there were only three doors, one on the right, the other on the left, and a fire exit straight ahead.

The door on the left was open a few inches, and for a second, shaking, I stopped in front of it. Would it be better to find Hazel here, or not to find her anywhere at all? Would she even want to see me? Or might she even be too sick to want anything anymore?

I pushed open the door which didn't make a sound. Inside was Hazel. It was definitely her. But she wasn't like I'd ever known her.

That Saturday was the most boring Saturday in recent memory. I wanted to visit Michelle's house, but I didn't want to sit there with her knowing she was thinking things about me. For the first time ever, I finished all my homework, just to take my mind off my dwindling social prospects. I checked my messages, deleting the ones from the soccer team. There was one email I couldn't ignore. It came from Dr. Tran, and it looked like she had written it late at night on Friday. She'd sent it to my account, but seemed to have mistaken it for my family's account.

This was what it said: "Ashley's blood cells have low amounts of FSH, which means she may be able to reproduce when she comes of age. A vaginoplasty would have to be performed to widen the birth canal. With androgen blockers and a full penectomy, she would be virtually indistinguishable from a non-intersex female."

I mashed the Delete button. The thought of some guy knocking me up made me feel like I was going to puke. My throat went tight with panic. Everybody talked about me like I was some abstract concept: barely even sentient, incapable of taking offense.

On Sunday, my self-imposed exile got on my nerves. I needed to hang out with somebody. For some reason, I still couldn't bear to know what Michelle was thinking, so I texted Corey and asked if he'd like to bike down to the Salem Willows. His response, when it came, wasn't as enthusiastic as it usually was.

uh
yeah i guess

Beggars weren't choosers.

I rode my bike up Summer Street and onto Lynde Street, slowing when I passed Gallows Hill with its crooked, creepy locust tree. According to local lore, accused witches had hung from it once. In a few weeks' time, the locals would hang cobwebs and animatronic skeletons from it instead.

The Salem Willows in the east of town was our only beach. Anyone picturing sun-bleached dunes and waves ripe for surfing was in for a rude awakening. The lumpy, cream-colored sand was dotted with dozens of weeping willow trees, green and gold tresses hanging from flexible, droopy branches. I hopped off my bike and walked it down the road to the shore. The sea was periwinkle, flecked with pink patches where the autumn sun paid it too much attention. Pedestrians in windbreakers walked beside the water. Down south, past the bed of rocks full of nesting, noisy seagulls, was a pizza place. I ate there sometimes, although their pie was kind of doughy.

"Yo," Corey said, pulling his bike up beside mine.
"What's up?"

"Not much," I said.

We hopped on our bikes, cycling toward the pizza place. Corey was always hungry, and I was pretty sure he was about to wheedle me into buying him a slice. He surprised me by stopping halfway down the path, little clouds of sand kicking up under his bike tires when he put his foot down. I was forced to stop too.

CHAPTER FOUR

When I get home from school, I see Javi outside playing football with the boy who lives down the street. Justin. I know Javi idolizes him. I also know Mami's opinion of him. "Ese niño es muy malcriado," "No tiene respeto," "Se porta muy mal." Justin is rude, has no respect, and behaves very badly. She has told Javi, in both English and Spanish, that he is not to play with Justin.

"Javi," I yell out, walking toward him. "Come here!"

Javi catches the perfect spiral from Justin and turns to me. "Millie, go away. Just leave me alone."

"Why is your sister such a downer, man?" Justin asks, catching Javi's return throw. "Tell her she needs to get a boyfriend and get a life."

I take a deep breath, trying to decide which boy I will turn my wrath on first. "Javi, get in the house right now. Justin, why don't you go do your homework? You want to stay in the fifth grade again next year?"

"Screw you, Millie," says the two-time fifth-grader. He grabs his ball and walks into his house.

Javi storms past me. "You ruin everything!"

"You know what Mami will say," I tell Javi, following him home.

"Because of course you're going to tell her," Javi screams over his shoulder. He flings open the front door and runs to his room.

Ceci is combing her Barbie's hair with her eyes fixed on the Disney Channel. "Five minutes and homework, Ceci," I say.

"Kay," she says without taking her eyes off the TV.

"Sele," I yell out as I dump my backpack by the door.

She comes into the living room from the kitchen. "What?"

"Javi was outside playing with Justin."

"Sorry. He must have snuck out." She walks back into the kitchen and sits down to finish her homework.

I sink into a kitchen chair and sit there trying to guess the contents of the refrigerator, grasping at some idea of what to make for dinner. I eventually pull myself to my feet and start boiling water for spaghetti.

Javi walks in a few minutes later, carrying his backpack to start homework. Normally it takes a half dozen requests and threats from me before he even starts. "I'm sorry, Millie. Please don't tell Mami."

I sigh. "Javi, you can't hang out with Justin anymore. You know how Mami feels about him, and I completely agree with her."

"I won't. I won't. Just don't tell her."

I shake my head, knowing I will probably keep his secret. "Just do your homework."

The three of them finish their homework, and Sele helps me make meat sauce to go with the spaghetti. After dinner, they take turns showering while I start the dishes. The landline phone rings just as I submerge my hands in the soapy, warm

CHAPTER 10

"Kitty, can you hear me?"

Faith's voice echoed in Kitty's ear. The sound was fuzzy, broken up with little pops and crackles that drowned out the edges of the words. Kitty reached up and tapped the little metal earpiece a couple of times to settle it in place better. Then she lifted her wrist and whispered into the microphone concealed in her bracllet.

"Load an' spotty," she replied.

"Do you have eyes on Liam?" Faith asked.

"Yes."

Kitty looked across the main concourse of Paddington Station and saw Liam seated on a bench, watching the crowd from behind a copy of The Times. It was midafternoon. The place was busy, but not as packed as it would become during the evening rush. Still, Kitty felt her heartbeat quicken at the sight of all the people rushing around. She took a moment to calm herself with a few deep breaths.

"Who we lookin' for again?" she asked. "Man in a gray suit?"

"Middle-aged, gray suit, carrying a black briefcase," Faith said.

"It's London," Kitty replied. "All the men at this railway station 'ave suits an' briefcases."

"Don't sound so glum, Kitty! You'll ferret him out, like you always do."

"Kitty," Liam interjected, "I've got eyes on our man."

All three of them were sharing the same radio frequency, which made things go faster, but it meant Kitty had to hear the crinkling of Liam's newspaper from time to time. It wasn't loud, but it was very annoying.

Kitty scanned the crowd again. "Where?"

"Just entered the concourse. To your left."

Kitty glanced to her left and saw the target: an average-looking man with graying hair, and a gray suit to match. He carried a black briefcase, which had a scuff mark on one corner.

Kitty waited until the man had moved several paces ahead of her, and then she followed, weaving through the crowd to keep up. She did her best to slide past people the way Mrs. Singh had taught her, but it wasn't exactly a perfected art. At one point, she bumped into someone in passing. Kitty blushed awkwardly and stammered an apology as she kept going.

"Kitty, are you running into people again?" Liam asked.

"You know me—graceful as a swan," Kitty grumbled back.

She followed the man in gray to the ticket window and hung back in the crowd, close enough to watch but not so close as to be noticed. The man set his case down and fished some coins out of his pocket to pay for a ticket. There was another man at the window next to his, examining a train schedule. This fellow wore a black suit and a bowler hat.

Kitty looked down and saw what she knew to expect: the man in gray had set his briefcase down next to an identical briefcase belonging to the man in black. As she watched, the man in black picked up the man in gray's case and headed for the far side of the concourse.

Luke smiled. Zahra giggled.

"Rufus McGuiken better never look me in the eyes," she said. "I'd give him a treat all right."

Luke laughed out loud and sat me back on his lap. He scratched my head while I thought about Rufus.

I thought Rufus was tops. But Zahra and Rufus never got along. They fought over me, mostly. Over who could walk me, to be precise.

Most days, Zahra would knock on the door and offer to take me for a walk while Luke worked. Most days, Luke said yes, tossed Zahra my leash, and off we'd go.

As soon as we left, Rufus would bound out of his door and insist that he come with us. This drove Zahra crazy.

Zahra was nine months older than Rufus. And those nine months gave Zahra the "right" to be trusted to take a wild Brisket like me to the park and make sure I ran through my obedience drills. Since Rufus was "way younger," his job was to make sure I got all my zoomies in and wiggles out.

If you ask me, the two of them made the perfect combination for an afternoon at the park. Even if they both bickered a lot.

"Zahra," Luke said. "I'm sorry. But we'll have to video-chat another time. Just got an alert that we've got a new case."

Luke scratched my wiry fur and asked if I was ready for a new job. I barked, YES!

"I better let you go straightaway then," Zahra said. "Anyway, Mom just got home. Dad has tea ready, and Mom will want to know how my homework is coming along."

Luke smiled. "Hope we haven't kept you from it."

"Not at all! I learned something new. I'll tell Rufus about it after tea. Goodbye, Brisket!"

Chapter 4

As Jesse sat in her classroom, she gazed out through the large picture window by her desk. She couldn't help but daydream about all of the things that she and Kimmy Kat Black had discussed that morning. Even though Kimmy could be a bit annoying, she was really smart and had a knack for math.

"Class," Miss Byrd's voice broke the silence in Jesse's head as she popped out of her daydream.

"Before we leave for Spring Break, I want to discuss The Riddle of The Rock that you've heard about all week," she continued.

"Now, it's not mandatory, but I encourage all of you to take part if you can.

ANDREA BROWN LITERARY AGENCY

It's impossible to understand Galápagos giant tortoises without exploring the archipelago, or series of islands, they call home. The Galápagos Islands are volcanic. They began rising out of the sea millions of years ago, thanks to a hot spot in the Pacific Ocean. A hot spot is a place where the earth's mantle, the layer of the earth between its inner core and outer crust, is hotter than usual. Rock melts to create magma in these hot spots, and that magma pushes up through the earth's crust to form volcanoes. When this happens in the sea, these volcanoes can grow into islands. This is how island chains like the Galápagos and Hawaiian Islands are formed.

But why are there multiple islands if there's just one hot spot? Because the earth's crust isn't just one big piece of rock. It's made of plates that are constantly moving. The Galápagos Islands are located close to where two plates meet, and both of them are moving. The Cocos Plate is slowly but surely sinking to the northeast, under Central America, while the Nazca Plate is being pulled to the east.

The Galápagos Islands are on the Nazca plate. As that plate moves, the hot spot beneath it stays put. Imagine holding a lit candle, and passing a big sheet of plywood over it. Different parts of the wood would burn as you moved it over the candle. That's sort of what happens with hot spots and the earth's plates. The hot spot ends up pushing up magma in different locations as time passes and the plate moves above it. Because of this, the seamount islands in the Galápagos archipelago, San Cristóbal and Santiago, were formed first. But eventually, the Nazca plate carried those islands away from the hot spot, so these islands stopped growing, and new islands began to form. Western islands, such as Fernandina and Isabela, are newer and have regular volcanic activity. Some of the westernmost islands are still being formed today.

How do plants and animals come to live on volcanic islands that grew out of the sea? They make a long, long journey. The first birds in the Galápagos are believed to have made a flight of more than 800 miles (1,300 km) from mainland Ecuador. Scientists believe reptiles such as iguanas, scorpions, and tortoises came from the South American mainland millions of years ago, too, after the new islands had cooled.

SCIENCE TAKEAWAY

Lemons contain a lot of citric acid. Baking soda is a base. When the basic baking soda comes into contact with the acidic lemon juice, a chemical reaction starts that creates carbon dioxide gas. The gas wants to escape from the liquid, which creates bubbles. Once the acid and base have finished reacting with each other, your volcano stops erupting.

best-case scenario, it's going to dramatically change the way we live. It's a shame that all needs to be said, but so it goes.

If summers feel warmer to you now than they did when you were a little kid, that's not your memory playing tricks on you. As of 2019, the twenty hottest years on record in human history have all happened in the last twenty-two years. That's not all. The ten hottest of those years have all happened since 1998, and the nine hottest since 2005. The five most recent full years for which data exist, 2014-2018, are also the top five when it comes to hottest temperature.

That research comes directly from the National Aeronautics and Space Administration (NASA) and the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration (NOAA), the US government agencies that track climate change. The reality is that ever since people started studying the annual global temperature in the 1800s, it's gone up dramatically. And in 2018, the United Nations Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change (more about it shortly) warned that the worst impacts of climate change will definitely hit if we allow the planet to get more than 2.7 degrees hotter than it was before the Industrial Revolution started. We're already past 1.8 degrees, so

What the Universe Intended

SAMUS STARBODY & ZEUS

I had just celebrated my twenty-first birthday when I went to the doctor for the checkup that changed my life. I still remember that moment so vividly. It was the Wednesday after Easter, April 3, 2013, and the nurse told me that my HIV test had come back positive. Everything went dark. I wanted to cry but couldn't. The clinic was almost an hour from where I went to school at the University of Illinois at Chicago. On the ride back, I tried to keep my mind blank for as long as possible so I wouldn't do something irrational. When I finally got to my dorm room, I broke down and spent the next week in bed, crying and sleeping.

I can't lie—I had been behaving badly. After a bad breakup months earlier, I had been yearning for attention. I told myself I was taking control of my sexuality and my body at the time, but the reality was that I had been acting irresponsible and reckless, and I knew that wasn't me. After my diagnosis I felt like I should've known better. I kept thinking, Maybe if you had focused on your art, or on your friends, or expressed yourself a little bit more, then you might not have gotten this.

The last month of my junior year was a blur. I came home for summer break depressed. I wasn't laughing as much. I wasn't enjoying the things I used to. I dressed differently, talked differently—I was just going through the motions. It was my dog, a Maltese puppy named Wynter I'd had since I was a sophomore in high school, who comforted me. While my sister was with her dad and my mom was at work, me and Wynter developed a closeness we didn't have before. I'd sit and talk to her, and she would stare into my eyes and listen to anything and everything. She wouldn't let me sleep for too long, but when I did go to sleep, I'd roll over to find her head on my pillow next to me. She understood that I was in pain. If I ever got upset, she'd lick my face or try to encourage me to go outside.

Before HIV, I rarely got sick and was used to running and dancing every day. I wasn't used to feeling weak and lethargic all the time. It was different when I was with Wynter, though. Every time I took her out, she was so excited that I couldn't help but be excited too. Her positivity was infectious. When I was feeling good, we would race and she would cut in front of me to stop me from winning, which made me laugh. No matter what I wanted to do or where I wanted to go, Wynter was beside me. She was almost like my nanny. Even though I was supposed to be taking care of her, she was taking care of me.

When I returned to school for my senior year, I was able to channel the frustration and anger over my HIV diagnosis into my work. I found a way to bring my art into my business classes, which I had previously dreaded but took because my parents pushed me to. Once I made that connection, I excelled and ended up having my most successful year in college.

CHAPTER 1

WELCOME TO ANTARCTICA

"ONE TOUCH OF NATURE MAKES THE WHOLE WORLD KIN."

William Shakespeare

George W. Gibbs, Jr. Diary entries

Jan. 9, 1940 "En route for Little America. It is very calm at sea and the sun is very bright tonight. We are expecting a midnight sun. I say tonight, but it doesn't get dark any more. Tomorrow we expect to cross the 180th meridian time belt in which it will be on Wednesday at noon, when we start across. After we cross it will be Tuesday, as we will lose a day."

Jan. 10, 1940 "En route for Little America. Today at noon crossed the 180th meridian. We are now going through the ice. It is very thick and sometimes we can find a hole, then again we make a hole by hitting the smaller icebergs. The captain climbed the mass pole up, as high as, the crows nest to man phones and direct the ship through the ice at last. Captain Jochansen is a civilian, who is the ice pilot and sail master aboard the USS Bear. This is the most thrilling sight I have ever experienced. Some of the icebergs, we hit with the ship, sound like thunder. Lat. 70°40' and Long. 180° meridian"

After over thirty-five days at sea, sailing more than 8,000 nautical miles in some of the world's roughest conditions, the men never give up. That's a good thing because they are at the beginning of their adventures. The quarters are tight on the Bear, with dogs stuffed in all parts of the ship. The dog drivers lash the sleds and assemble the gear for travel over the Antarctic terrain. Wool clothes such as pants, parkas, and eight pairs of gloves are distributed. The ice party try on their new reindeer boots. There are not enough correct sizes and they have to trade with each other to get the best fit.

The open water abruptly ends and the "Barrier" appears from the Bay of Whales. The massive Ross Ice Shelf "Barrier" stands at 150 to 200 feet tall at the highest places. It's the largest wall of ice on the planet, stretching for 370 miles east. It's all ice south from here to the South Pole, a sheet about the size of Texas. Two miles of the floating ice is anchored into the ocean bottom. Even though they're in the middle of a blizzard, the men are excited to step onto the surface. The seventy-five howling sled dogs on the ship feel the same way.

The scope and vision of the USASE was impressive. It was composed of 125 men; 160 dogs; one snowmobile, the 12-ton Snow Cruiser; two ships; and three unarmed army tanks. Also along were five thousand items "from paper clips to prefab houses". The expedition consisted of the most personnel, dogs, and equipment to ever go to the southern continent at one time. On the first segment of the trip, they

KING OF THE SKY ISLANDS

The Sierra Madre Occidental, or Mother Mountains of the West, is an immense mountain range that forms the backbone of western Mexico. This towering range starts in the tropical lands of southern Mexico, and runs north some 1,000 miles (1,609 km) to the arid, dry deserts in the state of Sonora which borders the United States. Here, the mountain range begins to split apart into isolated mountain peaks separated by rolling grasslands and desert. These are the Sky Islands, a loose network of nearly thirty small mountain ranges. The Sky Islands roll northward into the United States in southeastern Arizona.

The Sky Islands provide high-altitude habitats for animals to escape the suffocating heat on the desert floor, where summer temperatures can easily exceed 115°F (46°C). Some of these Sky

A Public Health Epidemic

The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), the US government organization responsible for monitoring health, considers sleep disorders such as insomnia a public health epidemic because they affect so many Americans. Insomnia is a sleep disorder characterized by an inability to get enough sleep. Insomnia can lead to sleep deprivation, but sleep deprivation can also be caused by choices a person makes, such as staying up late studying for a test. When you do that, you don't necessarily have insomnia, but you are sleep deprived.

Sleep deprivation can lead to poor performance during the day, especially at school or work. Inadequate sleep for any reason also leads to mental health issues such as anxiety, depression, and stress. And for a few people, not getting enough sleep can be downright dangerous. People may have serious car accidents if they drive while drowsy. Just like driving while drunk, drowsiness slows reaction time and leads to poor decision-making on the road. The National Safety Council estimates that drivers under the age of twenty-five are involved in at least 50 percent of the estimated six thousand fatal crashes each year related to drowsy driving.

Lack of sleep can lead to medical issues such as heart problems, diabetes, obesity, and high blood pressure. Insufficient sleep is suspected of being an early sign of Alzheimer's disease—a brain disease that leads to memory loss and dementia that is ultimately fatal. Sleep deprivation can even cause sleepwalking with fatal consequences, such as driving a car off a bridge or falling down the stairs.

We all need to make sleep a priority in our lives according to Dr. Timothy Morgenthaler, a past president of the American Academy of Sleep Medicine. "Healthy sleep is essential for physical health, mental well-being, and personal and public safety," he said. "Sleep is a necessity, not a luxury, and the promotion of healthy sleep should be a fundamental public health priority."

HOW LONG SHOULD YOU SLEEP?

The National Sleep Foundation recommends the following amount of daily sleep for various age groups.

1. Newborns (birth to 3 months old): 14 to 17 hours
2. Infants (4 to 11 months old): 12 to 15 hours
3. Toddlers (1 to 2 years old): 11 to 14 hours
4. Preschoolers (3 to 5 years old): 10 to 13 hours
5. School-age children (6 to 13 years old): 9 to 11 hours
6. Teenagers (14 to 17 years old): 8 to 10 hours
7. Young adults (18 to 25 years old): 7 to 9 hours
8. Adults (26 to 64 years old): 7 to 9 hours
9. Older adults (65 and older): 7 to 8 hours

Symptoms of Insomnia among Adolescents

While most teens have no trouble falling asleep, just over 60 percent feel they are not really rested some or most days.

about it. For one thing, its brightness changes as it orbits Saturn. It seems twice as bright during half of its orbit as it does during the other half. The only explanation scientists could think of was that half of Iapetus was almost black and the other half almost white. When the dark side is facing Earth, Iapetus looks dim. When the light side is facing Earth, Iapetus looks bright.

The first photos of Iapetus taken by the spacecraft Voyager 2 in 1981 revealed that Iapetus is indeed nearly half black and half white, with a sharp, S-shaped dividing line between the two halves. The little moon looks a lot like the Chinese black-and-white yin-yang symbol. Scientists aren't certain why Iapetus looks this way. One theory is that dark material blows from the next outermost moon, Phoebe, due to meteoroid impacts. The dark material then falls toward Saturn. Since Iapetus is between Phoebe and Saturn, it might sweep up some of this material. But no one has confirmed this.

Iapetus had some other surprises waiting for the Voyager researchers, notably the mountain range on Iapetus's equator. The ridge is an almost perfectly straight line and makes the moon look something like a walnut, or as though Iapetus were made in two halves that were squashed together. The mountain range is at least 800 miles (1,300 km) long, wrapping one-third of the way around the moon. The peaks of the range are up to 8 miles (13 km) high, 3 miles (5 km) higher than the highest mountains on Earth, which is impressive for a moon only 914 miles (1,471 km) wide. No one knows what formed this weird-looking mountain range. Several ideas have been proposed. One of the most popular is that Iapetus once had a ring of debris circling it. Eventually, all of this debris fell, bit by bit, onto the moon. Because of the low gravity, it landed on the surface at a fairly low speed. Instead of

The stark divide between the black and white moons on Iapetus would make for incredible landscapes for any visitors.

Before I could think about this more, Avi marched into the living room. "I'm helping with your case, Pinky," he announced. "Do you want to hear what I'm going to do?"

"Not really, Avi. But go ahead anyway. Just make it fast."

"I'm dusting for fingerprints," he said, holding up the small brush from his spy kit. In his other hand, he held the donut bag we'd gotten at the costume store. "Maybe I'll find a match with the thief's print."

I rolled my eyes. "Avi, you're only going to find our fingerprints, because we live here!"

"Uh-uh, Pinky. Just wait."

Lucy and I watched as Avi dusted the living room desk. "No match here," he mumbled. "Only Dad's fingerprints."

Then he moved on to the windowsill. "Just Mom's prints. I'll try the bookcase next."

"Avi, you and I have touched that bookcase a million times," I said. "And so have Mom, Dad, and Grandma Phyllis. You're never going to find a match."

"You're wrong, Pinky! Look at this!" he shouted.

I raced over to see what he had found. A fingerprint on the bookcase matched the one on the donut bag!

CHAPTER 5

"Almost ready?" Mom calls up to my room on Monday morning.

"Yes." Even though I'm nervous about being caught and thrown into community center jail, I try to act normal. Every time I want to back out—which is basically every other second—I think about the phone I want to get with the cool case that changes color. It's called a color mood case. And right now, my mood is red hot.

"Let's go." Mom holds up her keys. The tiny clay snail I made her in art class swings back and forth on her keychain. I wish I were a snail right about now and could hide in my shell.

"Are you sure about those clothes?" she asks me.

I'm wearing jean shorts, a plain blue T-shirt, and sneakers—not the dancewear Mom bought me over the weekend. Bicycle shorts and bright workout shirts with geometric shapes are just not my thing. And I don't want the other students in the reading class to be blinded by my outfit. "I think this will be fine for the first day," I say.

In the car, Mom listens to her audiobook about raising a child in a technology-obsessed society, and I'm glued to the family iPad. I don't tell her I'm playing Spelling Wiz because if I did, she'd probably make me sign up for the spelling club the first day of sixth grade.

After the school bee, I had nightmares for a couple of weeks. In my dreams, huge letters chased me through the hallways, and all the kids were laughing. I know it sounds silly, but when I was stuck inside the dream and couldn't get out, it was very scary.

I mean, if I had won the county spelling bee, which I totally wouldn't have, it wouldn't have made me popular or anything. Mr. Holly sent Mitchell Bucket in my place. He came in third. He's not cool. He chews his shoelaces. I didn't think that was possible until I saw him and his bony knees in action. He lost on the word catti. A bunch of kids started calling him Catti King after that. Mitchell thought it was funny. I did not. Luckily, I know how to spell catti. c-a-t-t-i.

CHAPTER 2 PALACE PLANS

By the time Sunday rolled around, I'd forgotten all about Mr. Schneider and his hairy hands. Well, not completely, but seeing Luke Skywalker and C-3PO were way more important. Frank's mom dropped us off in front of the only movie theater in all of Croyfield, the Picture Palace.

It wasn't a real palace. The building had a fake cut-out on the front that was supposed to make it look like one. I knew that 'cause Dad's factory made it. Of course, I wasn't the only one with that insider information. Just about everyone in Croyfield knew someone who worked at the factory. It was the biggest place in the whole town, and it made stuff out of fiberglass like tabletops and car parts and cutouts that looked like palaces. I didn't know what fiberglass was, exactly, other than a hard material made out of a bunch of dangerous chemicals. So dangerous they could kill you. At least that's what I'd overheard Mom say.

We stood in line for our movie tickets at the booth just outside of the entrance. Frank stood on his tiptoes and tried to look over the shoulders of the lady in front of us.

"What are you doing?" I asked.

He pointed to the person sitting behind the glass counter handing out the tickets. I tried to stand on my tiptoes so I could see too, but Frank pulled me back down.

"That's my brother's friend Jill. Just let me do the talking. I'll bet I can get us in for free."

Frank's older brother, Raymond, was seventeen and went to the high school with Alice. I liked Raymond. Sometimes he let Frank and me hang out while his band practiced in their basement. I hoped Raymond's friend Jill was as nice as Raymond. A free movie meant I wouldn't have to spend all my allowance money.

We waited while the woman in front of us at the counter bought her tickets. She had three kids with her who were screaming and jumping around. With a string of tickets in one hand and a still-open wallet

Steady Companions

We settle into our first-class stateroom, and I find a place for my flowers and Schnitzel, the stuffed dachshund

Grandma gave me for the trip.
At eleven, I'm too old for a stuffed animal, but his fur is so soft, and he smells like Grandma's gingerbread.

We are aboard the M.S. St. Louis, steaming our way to Cuba. Father says it's a good place to wait until our visas allow us to enter the United States. When we reach

Cherbourg, my cousin will come on board.

It's been 178 days since Hans left Germany and me. Uncle thought it best to send him away to a safer place.

Hans boarded a train for Holland with lots of other children.

That was the Kindertransport.
Mother and Father sent me away too, but I stayed in Germany with their friends. Then Father got us tickets for this ship,

and he came to get me.

We'll have a real cousin reunion and maybe celebrate with ice cream.
Someone can take our picture.
